I always knew that I depended too much on my phone. I didn't know how much, so I decided to go without it for a few days to find out.

Every morning since I got a smart phone, I'd used the Weather Channel APP to find out what to wear. On the first morning, I had to dress without guidance, but thankfully I was able to guess that the day would be cold and foggy by looking out of my window.

I couldn't tell what time it was. I hadn't worn a watch for more than a year, because my phone showed the time. So I was late for picking up friends who had been on the bus for two hours from Santa Monica to Palos Verde. I was also late for my part-time job. And even worse, I couldn't call people to tell them that I was running late.

Getting to places was harder, too. I got lost because I couldn't use the GPS on my phone. My driving, though, got a lot safer because I no longer had my phone in one hand checking directions while driving with the other.

But the number one trouble was not having my contact list. I forgot to write down my friends' and family members' phone numbers before I started the challenge. It was sad to realize that I couldn't remember my brother's and my mom's phone numbers. Oh, how I wished to turn on the phone for just a second to look up the phone numbers!

Even with all the problems, however, I found peace not worrying about missing a text message or an email.

This challenge was a great learning experience. It surprised me how I'd taken no notice of even the simplest things like remembering phone numbers. We all need to spend some time thinking about how we should use our phones.
